

Dear Partners,

There are many methods to measure a company's accomplishment. In my view, however, a sincerely well-off company is one that finds a way to return some of its rewards back to the community and the region. I feel a company cannot consider itself truly effective unless it makes an active effort to give back.

Our values are essential to our business, and we take great pleasure in investing knowledge and proficiency in business ideas, enabling people to realize their dreams. We have a robust support network that inspires dynamic partnerships, creating differentiated access to support and know-how. Our innate knowledge of the region provides an perfect fit with businesspersons and new business enterprises coming from different cultures with which we maintain long term partnerships.

Bringing insight, credibility and financial support, we translate potential business opportunities into profitable businesses. We have a strong and skilled team of local and international business professionals, in fact our biggest wealth, in my opinion, is to have international talent blended with local talent under one roof. Most of the businesses that are successful have the proper management and right people to lead.

The compelling combination of our values, relationships, market focus and sound business-sense place us in a strong position to enlarge each business opportunity, creating further growth and development and thus bringing us back around in the circle of sustainability - giving back to the community.

Sincerely,

Dan Mishra
